

FROG

Making their homes in marshes, swamps, rivers and lakes, as well as rainforests and muggy grasslands, frogs are amphibians that prefer temperate to warm climates, including frogs, toads and similar creatures. They shoot their extremely long, sticky tongues from their mouths to catch prey and draw it back into their maws. Though their preferred tactic is to lie in wait for victims, they can jump quite far with their powerful legs. Some frogs are highly venomous, secreting deadly contact poison through their skin—such frogs are found in warm climates and are colorful as a noticeable, beautiful warning. Yet most frogs are quite harmless to mortals due to their small size.

- Leaping frogs include large bullfrogs.
- Jumping frogs include gigantic frogs and toads.
- Bonerim frogs are variants with extra-strong bony growths lining the rims of their mouths, giving them extra crushing power, as well as oversized mouths and guts that allow them to swallow much larger prey. They also have thick blobs of leathery skin on their flesh.
